SDG 10: REDUCED INEQUALITIES PROGRESS REPORT

Sustainable Development Goal 10 (SDG 10): Reduced Inequalities aims to reduce inequality within and among countries by promoting the social, economic, and political inclusion of all people, regardless of age, sex, disability, race, ethnicity, origin, religion, economic status, or other circumstances. It emphasizes the importance of ensuring equal opportunities, eliminating discriminatory practices, empowering marginalized and underrepresented groups, and creating inclusive societies where everyone can participate in development and benefit from its progress. Achieving this goal requires sustained efforts to address barriers to education, employment, public services, and social participation while promoting human rights, fairness, and respect for diversity.

Educational institutions play an important role in advancing SDG 10 by providing accessible learning opportunities, promoting equal treatment, developing skills for employment and livelihood, and fostering awareness of human rights and social inclusion. Through education, community engagement, research, and partnerships, colleges and universities can help reduce inequalities and empower individuals from diverse backgrounds to participate meaningfully in society. In this regard, the City College of Cagayan de Oro (CCCDO) contributes to SDG 10 by advancing inclusive education, supporting community development, promoting gender equality and respect for diversity, and creating opportunities for underserved and underrepresented sectors.

This report compares CCCDO's contributions to SDG 10 in 2024 and 2025, examining the development of its programs and initiatives to promote inclusion and reduce inequalities. The 2024 report highlights an established portfolio of initiatives centered on access to education, employment and livelihood linkages, community outreach, research and policy engagement, and inter-agency partnerships. Its quantitative summary records outreach across 17 barangays serving 1,200 youth, three major employment events reaching 800 jobseekers, community engagement in six barangays, five published studies on human rights and equity, and four inter-agency programs. These efforts demonstrate the College's engagement in expanding access to opportunities and strengthening community support systems.

In 2025, CCCDO's initiatives reflected a broader and more differentiated approach to inclusion. Alongside continuing educational and livelihood pathways, the College pursued Alternative Learning System (ALS) initiatives designed around learners' schedules and readiness, human-rights training for 30 personnel, and research involving 273 implementers on child-rights education. Other initiatives provided opportunities for Indigenous youth representation, promoted gender sensitivity and women's technical skills development, advanced LGBTQIA+ inclusion through the Take Pride 2025 initiative, and strengthened youth leadership and volunteerism. The College also conducted community education outreach that reached approximately 291 residents across six barangays, extending learning and engagement opportunities to local communities.

The comparison highlights a progression from broad service access and employment linkages in 2024 toward more differentiated forms of inclusion in 2025. This development is reflected in efforts to adapt learning opportunities to individual circumstances, strengthen rights-based institutional practices, support Indigenous youth representation, promote LGBTQIA+ inclusion, and create platforms for young people to participate in civic life. Together, these initiatives demonstrate that reducing inequalities involves not only making services and opportunities available but also addressing the different circumstances and barriers that affect people's ability to access them and participate with dignity. Through its educational programs, institutional initiatives, community engagement, and partnerships, CCCDO continues to demonstrate the role of higher education in advancing a more equitable, inclusive, and participatory society in alignment with SDG 10.

Key Findings

- The 2024 baseline emphasizes inclusive education, livelihood and job linkages, community outreach, research, and inter-agency collaboration as the major reported program areas.
- The 2024 report provides aggregate reach indicators, including 1,200 youth served through barangay caravans and 800 jobseekers served through three employment-related events.
- The 2025 narrative describes a wider range of inclusion mechanisms, particularly alternative learning pathways, human-rights and child-protection activity, gender sensitivity, Indigenous youth representation, LGBTQIA+ visibility, youth leadership, and community-based education access.
- Selected 2025 figures include approximately 291 residents reached through Klarex nga Serbisyo sa Baryo in six barangays, more than 80 Indigenous youth delegates at the First Indigenous Peoples Youth Assembly, 30 participants in a human-rights workshop, and 273 implementers involved in the cited child-rights research.
- Across both years, CCCDO's contribution is presented through education, partnerships, research, outreach, and participation. The 2025 report gives more explicit attention to groups and barriers that can be overlooked in general service-delivery models.

Institutional Context and SDG 10

SDG 10 seeks to reduce inequality within and among countries by promoting the social, economic, and political inclusion of all people, regardless of age, sex, disability, race, ethnicity, origin, religion, economic status, or other circumstances. In higher education, this objective is reflected not only in admission and learning opportunities, but also in employment access, rights awareness, safe and inclusive environments, representation, community participation, and institutional partnerships.

CCCDO's two reporting periods show complementary institutional roles. The 2024 report centers on connecting underserved communities with education, scholarships, livelihood activities, employment opportunities, research, and public-sector partners. The 2025 narrative retains access and community work while describing more targeted approaches to learner readiness, human-rights education, Indigenous youth voice, gender-fair practices, LGBTQIA+ inclusion, and leadership development. The report reads these developments as SDG 10-related contributions where the supplied sources describe a clear connection to inclusion or equal opportunity.

2024 Baseline: Access, Livelihood, and Community Linkages

Inclusive education and barangay access

The 2024 quantitative summary identifies inclusive education as the largest category in the accompanying activity-distribution figure, accounting for seven programmatic activity/output items, or 30.4% of the chart's 23 total items. The report's quantitative table describes ALS and scholarship outreach through barangay caravans, with services delivered in 17 barangays and 1,200 youth served. The caravans brought information and access closer to communities by combining on-site ALS registration, health services, and scholarship support for disadvantaged youth.

The importance of this approach is practical: educational opportunity can be limited by distance, lack of information, administrative barriers, or difficulty reaching institutions. A barangay-based service model helps connect learners and families with education and support where they live. This forms a clear foundation for the more tailored ALS designs described in 2025.

Employment and livelihood pathways

Employment and livelihood initiatives represented six programmatic activity/output items, or 26.1% of the 2024 distribution chart. The table records three major events and 800 jobseekers served through PESO job fairs and livelihood seminars. The report also describes coordination with PESO-CDO and TESDA, entrepreneurial mentoring, livelihood grants for some alumni, and collaboration with the City Social Welfare and Development Office (CSWDO) and Persons with Disability Affairs Office (PDAO).

These efforts connect education to economic participation. Job fairs and livelihood sessions provide routes for jobseekers to encounter employers, learn about opportunities, and consider skills or enterprise pathways. The involvement of PDAO and CSWDO also signals attention to participation by people with disabilities, women, and other underrepresented groups. Employment access is a central aspect of reducing inequality because unequal access to work can reinforce differences in income, stability, and social participation.

Community engagement, research, and partnerships

The 2024 report allocates five programmatic activity/output items (21.7%) to community outreach, three (13.0%) to research and policy engagement, and two (8.7%) to institutional partnerships. Its table records community engagement reaching six barangays, five published papers on human rights and equity, and four inter-agency programs associated with PDAO inclusion and city linkages. The report also describes research on community empowerment, youth leadership, and sustainable livelihoods, as well as faculty participation in human-rights education capacity building.

Together, these strands broaden the 2024 baseline beyond service delivery. Research can establish a knowledge base for understanding inequalities, while partnerships connect institutional programs with public offices and community organizations. The 2024 portfolio therefore combines direct access initiatives with mechanisms for coordination, evidence-building, and wider participation.

2025 Progress: More Differentiated and Rights-Based Inclusion

Alternative learning and education pathways

In May 2025, CCCDO presented three proposed ALS initiatives during a stakeholder session with DepEd Cagayan de Oro: Pagpamalandong, an action-research mentoring program for ALS teachers; Pagtulay, a weekend bridging academy intended to strengthen academic readiness; and Paglantaw, a career-mapping program to help learners explore educational and career options. In July, the College and ALS implementers co-designed the ALS Weekend Bridging Academy, focusing on English, Mathematics, and Science foundations.

This development adds specificity to the access-focused baseline in 2024. Barangay caravans made services easier to reach; the 2025 ALS work considered how learning itself could be arranged to fit learners' circumstances. Weekend delivery is relevant to people who work on weekdays or carry family responsibilities, while the bridging curriculum addresses differences in academic preparation. This matters because equal opportunity is not always achieved by offering everyone an identical pathway. Learners may need different forms of support to reach comparable educational opportunities.

The 2025 report also describes Klarex nga Serbisyo sa Baryo as a community-based education outreach initiative. CCCDO personnel promoted technical-vocational programs, degree courses, enrollment schedules, and eligibility requirements; the cited article reports approximately 291 residents reached across six barangays. This continues the 2024 principle of bringing educational services closer to communities while documenting a specific reach figure for the 2025 outreach activity.

Human rights, child protection, and equal treatment

On February 13–14, 2025, CCCDO's Center for Human Rights Education partnered with the Commission on Human Rights Region X for a two-day capacity-building workshop attended by 30 teaching and non-teaching personnel. Topics included the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Convention on the Rights of the Child, Gender and Development, gender-based sexual harassment, and the COLEGA teaching manual. The initiative brought rights education into institutional staff development, linking inclusion to the professional knowledge and practices of employees.

The 2025 narrative also highlights a study on building a child-rights-respecting community through the COLEGA Teaching Manual in Cagayan de Oro. The mixed-methods study involved 273 implementers and, according to CCCDO's publication announcement, reported improvements in implementation, child-rights advocacy, governance, and school practices, with reduced physical bullying identified as a significant outcome. This is a distinct type of evidence from event participation: it reports a research-based assessment of practice and describes changes associated with rights-focused implementation.

Compared with the 2024 reference to human-rights and equity publications, the 2025 account connects rights-related work more visibly to a specific staff workshop and a cited study involving implementers. This matters because equal treatment depends not only on formal access, but also on how institutions respond to discrimination, protect children, and create safe learning and working settings.

Gender sensitivity and women's access to skills

In March 2025, CCCDO conducted Gender Sensitivity in the Workplace training with the Philippine Commission on Women. The initiative addressed gender awareness, bias, stereotypes, gender-fair communication, and inclusive workplace practices for non-teaching personnel. Also in March, the “Eba Ka Talaga!” activity conducted by CCCDO’s Gender and Development office and TSTI provided basic electrical skills training as part of Women’s Month.

These efforts add a clearer gender-focused dimension to the broad access and equity work described in the 2024 report. Workplace training addresses the culture and daily practices that shape how people are treated; technical skills training opens a learning opportunity in a practical field. Their importance lies in addressing both institutional attitudes and access to capability development, rather than treating equality solely as a question of enrollment or participation totals.

Indigenous youth representation

On August 1, 2025, the First Indigenous Peoples Youth Assembly brought together more than 80 Indigenous youth delegates from communities including Bayanga, Dansolihon, Lumbia, Taglimao, and Tuburan. CCCDO’s August 4 article highlighted Higaonon student and youth leader Micah Jabiniar Aguilar, who delivered the assembly’s opening address. This placed Indigenous youth voice and leadership within the documented SDG 10 narrative.

The contribution is significant because inclusion involves both access to services and representation in public and community life. The assembly created a forum where Indigenous youth could articulate perspectives and discuss community development while maintaining cultural connections. In comparison with the 2024 baseline’s broad outreach and underrepresented-group inclusion, the 2025 account gives a more visible example of Indigenous youth representation as a distinct strand of equity work.

LGBTQIA+ inclusion and community recognition

Take Pride 2025, held on June 20–21, 2025, brought together students, advocates, community members, and partner organizations through advocacy discussions, performances, and solidarity activities. The initiative was later recognized as the Most Outstanding City-Wide Project for Social Involvement at the Oro Youth Awards–KASADYA Culminating Program. The 2025 narrative identifies collaboration with Andam Higala Inc., the Sangguniang Kabataan of Barangay Gusa, the City Gender and Development Office, and other partners.

This is an important broadening of the report’s inclusion themes. Take Pride provided a visible community platform for diversity, dialogue, and solidarity, with external recognition of its social involvement. Recognition indicates that the project received formal acknowledgment; it should not be interpreted on its own as a quantitative measure of decreased discrimination. Its documented value for this report lies in the activity, partner network, and public recognition associated with inclusion and participation.

Youth leadership, volunteerism, and civic participation

Mission 626: A Bridging Leadership Crash Course, conducted on April 26–27, 2025, brought together student volunteers, aspiring student government officers, leaders from other higher education institutions, and Sangguniang Kabataan officials. Its topics included civic engagement, project and event management, volunteerism, social innovation, accountability, and collaborative leadership. In September, CCCDO’s Central Student Government reaffirmed commitments to a safe, student-centered community, integrity, transparency, accountability, and service. The College also documented a partnership with the Philippine National Volunteer Service Coordinating Agency, formalized through an agreement signed on August 6, 2025.

These activities connect the 2024 emphasis on community engagement and inter-agency linkages with more visible student leadership and volunteerism initiatives in 2025. Leadership development can create opportunities for young people to participate in decision-making and community affairs. Partnerships connect those skills with broader civic work, giving inclusion a participatory dimension beyond access to education or employment alone.

Interpretation: The 2024 chart places inclusive education first at 30.4%, followed by employment and livelihood initiatives at 26.1%, community outreach at 21.7%, research and policy engagement at 13.0%, and institutional partnerships at 8.7%. This distribution describes a portfolio in which access to education and economic participation occupy the largest shares of the reported program mix. Community outreach supplies a further route for reaching people beyond the campus, while research and partnerships provide institutional and knowledge-based support for inclusion.

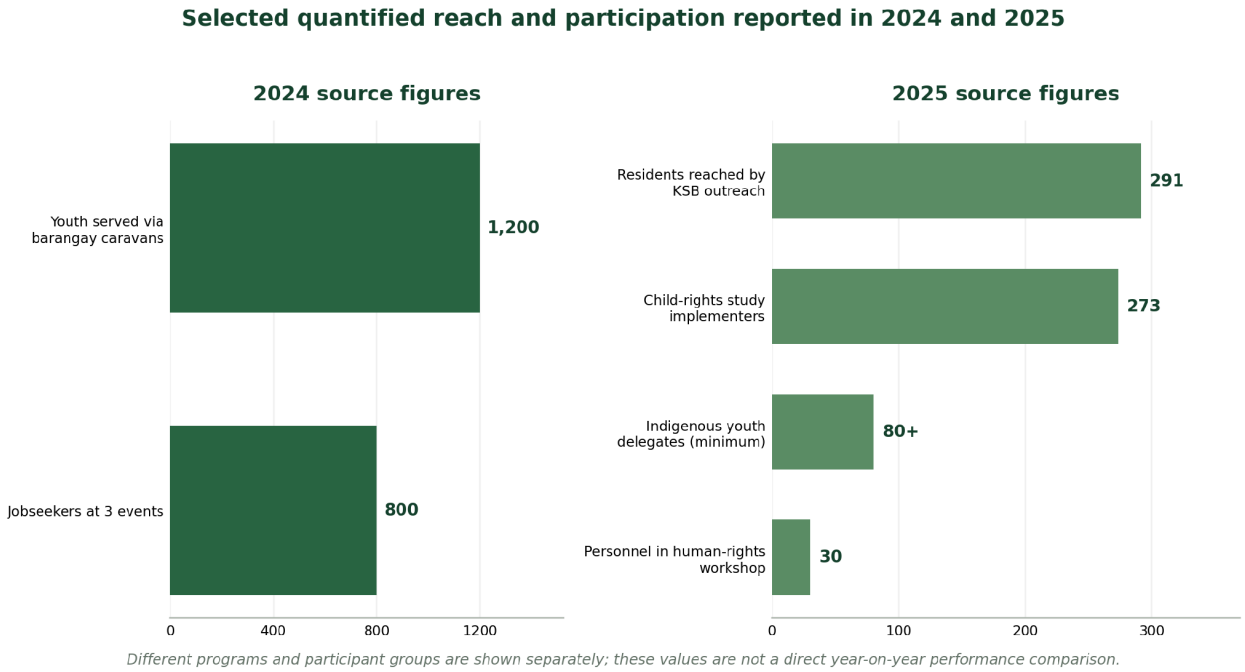

Figure 2. Selected quantitative reach figures stated in the 2024 and 2025 source materials. The program groups and units differ by year, so the bars should not be read as a like-for-like performance ranking.

Interpretation: The 2024 report gives broad reach figures for youth served through barangay caravans (1,200) and jobseekers engaged through three major events (800). The 2025 narrative provides more targeted counts: approximately 291 residents reached through education outreach, 273 implementers included in child-rights research, more than 80 Indigenous youth delegates, and 30 participants in a human-rights workshop. The values illustrate different dimensions of inclusion—community reach, research participation, representation, and staff capacity-building. Because these are different populations and activity types, their importance lies in what each initiative addressed rather than their raw size relative to one another.

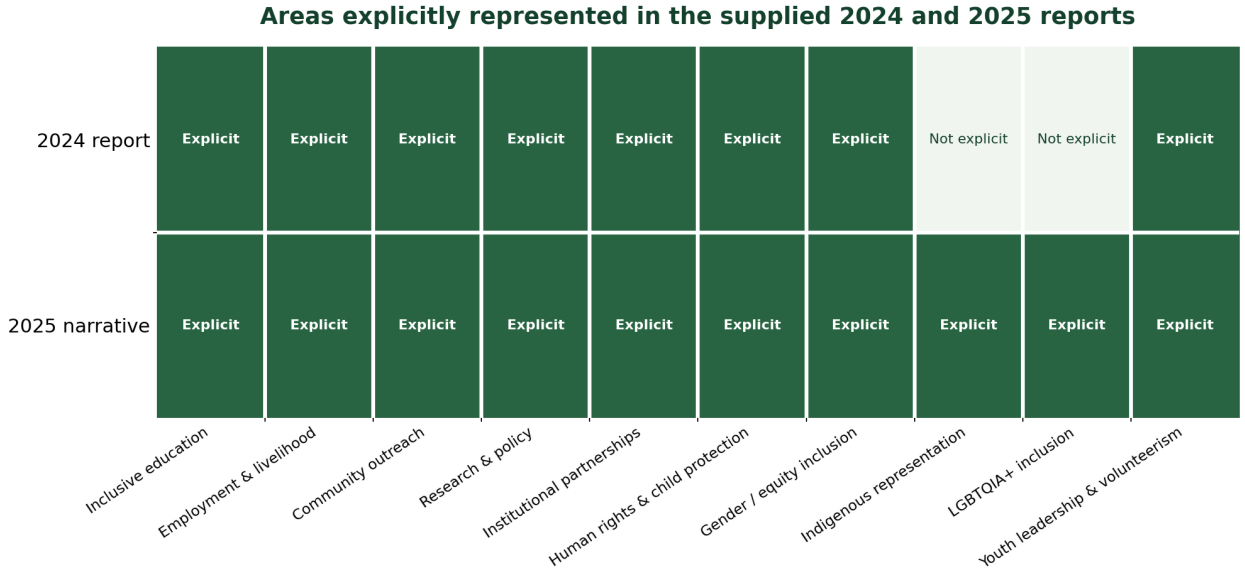

Figure 3. Explicit thematic coverage in the supplied 2024 report and 2025 narrative. "Not explicit" means the topic is not singled out in the source narrative; it does not mean no related activity occurred.

Interpretation: The 2024 report explicitly organizes its work around education, employment, community engagement, research, and partnerships, and it also discusses underrepresented groups, gender, and human-rights-related research. The 2025 narrative retains those strands while separately highlighting human-rights and child protection, Indigenous youth representation, LGBTQIA+ inclusion, and youth leadership. The matrix therefore illustrates a change in reporting focus and differentiation: inequality is described through more specific groups, rights, identities, and routes to participation in 2025.

Interpretation: Education access, rights and safety, representation, and civic capacity operate as connected routes to inclusion. Accessible learning can reduce barriers to participation in higher education; rights education supports fair and safe institutional practice; representation helps ensure community voices are heard; and leadership/volunteerism creates opportunities to participate in decisions and public life. The combined pathway shows why reducing inequalities requires more than one type of activity.

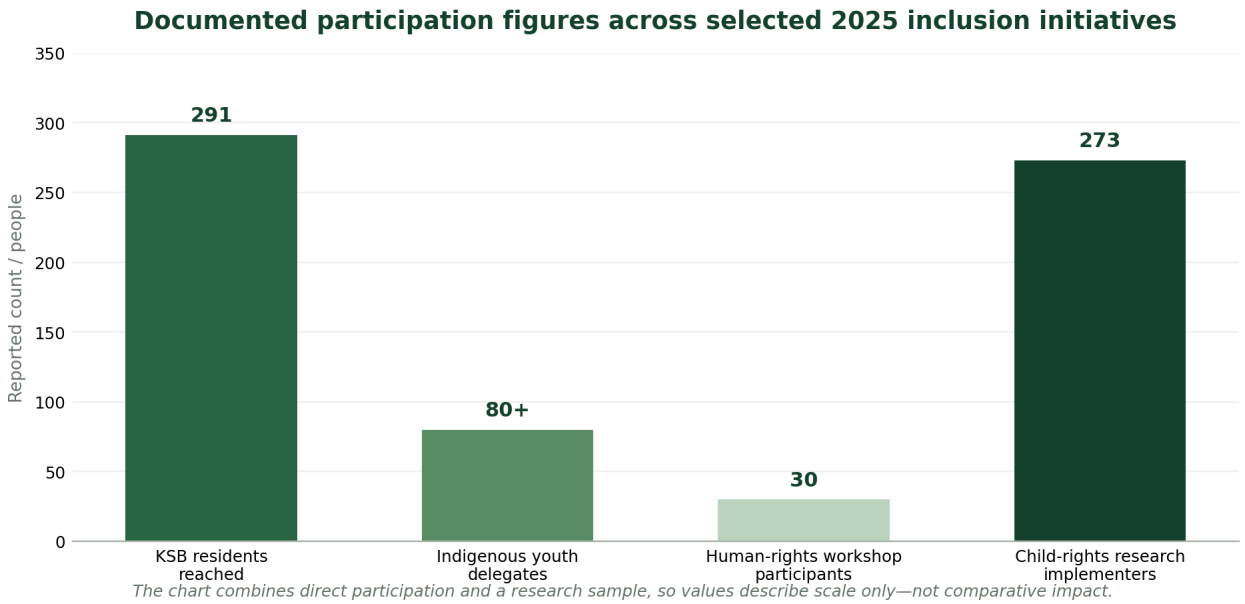

Figure 5. Selected 2025 participation and study figures reported in the supplied SDG 10 narrative.

Interpretation: The four selected counts show that CCCDO's 2025 inclusion portfolio includes community outreach (291 residents), a research implementation sample (273 implementers), Indigenous youth representation (more than 80 delegates), and staff capacity-building (30 participants). These figures relate to different activities rather than one combined beneficiary total. Together they illustrate the variety of institutional pathways used to address access, rights, representation, and institutional practice.

Institutional Progress and Synergy Across the Two Years

The 2024 and 2025 reports show a connected sequence rather than a change from one unrelated agenda to another. In 2024, CCCDO's documented emphasis was on broad access and economic participation through barangay caravans, job fairs, livelihood programs, research, and partnerships. In 2025, the institution continued community access and partnership work while articulating more tailored approaches to educational readiness, rights-aware institutional practice, cultural representation, and inclusive civic participation.

Alignment with SDG 10 and Related Development Priorities

The reported initiatives align most directly with SDG 10's emphasis on social, economic, and political inclusion and equal opportunity. Educational outreach, ALS bridging, and scholarships relate to access to learning and participation. Employment fairs and livelihood programs connect inclusion with economic opportunity. Human-rights and child-rights education relate to equal treatment and the prevention of discriminatory practices. Take Pride 2025, gender sensitivity training, and Indigenous youth representation make social inclusion and voice more visible. Mission 626, volunteerism, and student governance connect inclusion with civic participation.

SDG 10-related dimension	2024 evidence	2025 evidence	Interpretation
Social and educational inclusion	ALS and scholarship outreach; 1,200 youth across 17 barangays.	ALS program design, weekend bridging academy, KSB outreach to about 291 residents.	The focus moves from access and service connection toward tailored learning pathways for different circumstances.
Economic inclusion	800 jobseekers reached through three major events; livelihood mentoring and grants described.	TalenTrail 2.0, technical/vocational education, women's basic electrical skills training.	Work-related opportunity is linked with skills development and inclusion of participants facing distinct barriers.
Equal treatment and rights	Human-rights/equity studies and capacity-building references.	30-person human-rights workshop; COLEGA study involving 273 implementers with reported implementation and school-practice improvements.	The 2025 narrative gives more specific examples of rights-based training and research on practice.
Representation and participation	Broad inclusion of women, persons with disabilities, and underrepresented groups described.	80+ Indigenous youth delegates; Take Pride 2025 and its city-wide social involvement recognition.	Makes visibility, voice, cultural representation, and safe participation more explicit in the SDG 10 account.
Partnerships and civic leadership	City government, PESO-CDO, CSWDO, PDAO, and other inter-agency programs.	DepEd, CHR Region X, PCW, PNVSCA, Andam Higala Inc., SK partners, and other collaborators.	Cross-sector relationships connect institutional resources to education, rights, community, and leadership initiatives.

Conclusion

The 2024–2025 comparison shows continuity in CCCDO's commitment to reducing inequalities through education access, employment and livelihood connections, community outreach, research, and institutional partnerships. The 2024 report establishes a quantitative baseline centered on broad service reach: 1,200 youth across 17 barangays, 800 jobseekers across three major employment events, six barangays reached through community engagement, five published human-rights and equity papers, and four inter-agency programs.

The 2025 narrative develops this foundation by describing more differentiated forms of inclusion. These include proposed and co-designed ALS pathways, community education outreach, staff human-rights capacity building, child-rights research, gender-sensitive workplace practices, women's technical skills development, Indigenous youth representation, Take Pride 2025, youth leadership and volunteerism, and partnerships supporting community participation. The account makes clear that inequality can be experienced through educational preparation, time and access barriers, social exclusion, lack of representation, and unequal participation in institutional and public life.

The overall progress is best understood as a broadening of the documented inclusion approach—from primarily access, employment, and community-linkage measures in the 2024 baseline toward a more explicit, multi-dimensional account in 2025 that includes rights, identity, representation, learning design, and civic leadership. This matters because inclusive development depends on whether people can reach opportunities, participate with dignity, have their rights respected, and contribute to the decisions and communities that shape their lives.
